Good evening everyone. I'm Noah Turner—Mike's twin, built-in best friend, and, depending on the day, his most relentless rival.

Thank you to the Bennetts for opening your home and hearts tonight. It feels good to be together on the eve of something big.

Mike and Sophie met the way good stories sometimes start—by accident, in bad weather. After a stormy commute, they landed at the same office coffee machine looking like survivors of a small apocalypse. Coworkers gave them that not-so-subtle nudge toward a first date, and it turns out caffeine and chaos were a pretty solid foundation.

In three years, they've built a life with ordinary rituals that somehow feel like celebrations. Italian on Sundays—the kind that makes the whole place smell like garlic and tomatoes. Half-marathon training where “let's just do three miles” turns into seven because the conversation won't quit. Board game nights where the competitiveness is friendly, mostly, and a small queen named Olive rules the house from the back of the couch.

There were mile markers, too. In 2022, they pointed a car up the Pacific Coast Highway and learned they travel like teammates—sharing snacks, playlists, and the front-seat DJ duties. And then this year, at a lighthouse on the coast, Mike asked, Sophie said yes, and he somehow pulled off the near-impossible: a surprise dinner afterward with family waiting, all of us pretending we weren't refreshing our phones every five minutes.

I know Mike as the kid who always tried to beat me to the finish line, then circled back to pull me across it. Sophie, you carry that same energy—steady, generous, patient. Together, you make the hard things calmer and the good things last longer.

To everyone who traveled to be here—thank you. Tomorrow, let's wish for calm nerves and big smiles.

And tonight, if you'll raise your glasses with me—to partnership that's chosen daily, to patience that makes room for each other's quirks, and to joy that shows up in the small, shared things.

To Sophie and Mike.
